The Water Cure, Archaeological Investigations at the Sanitarium and Bath House, Cascade Springs, South Dakota South Dakota State Historical Society, Department of Education, 1967

The Water Cure is an overview of the growth of health tourism in the southern Black Hills of South Dakota during the 1890s. During this era, medical doctors believed in the curative powers of drinking and bathing in mineral waters. They encouraged people to restore their health in therapeutic settings around natural warm springs. Bath houses, founded on the age-old Turkish bath experience, offered dry, steam, and shower rooms as well as individual or group plunge baths to cure maladies such as hemorrhoids or rheumatism. In the spring of 1890, venture capitalists syndicated the Carlsbad Spring Company. The company platted large tracts of land around the small townsite of Cascade Springs in Fall River County, South Dakota. The crown jewel of their capital venture would be a two-story Sanitarium and Bath House, which would divert the warm mineral waters out of the local creeks and springs into the rooms. The sandstone building was designed in the Richardsonian Romanesque architectural style. In 1893, a nation-wide economic recession contributed to the collapse of the company's venture. By 1908, Cascade Springs was a virtual ghost town. A century later the South Dakota Department of Transportation planned to straighten a curve on Highway 71, cutting right through the ruins of the Sanitarium and Bath House. They contracted with the Archaeological Research Center, a program of the South Dakota State Historical Society, to conduct mitigative archaeological excavations in 1996 and 1997, prior to starting road work. The archaeologists uncovered the original footprint of the building, as photographed above, in 1997. The Water Cure represents a collaborative effort between the South Dakota Department of Transportation and the Archaeological Research Center to provide the results of the historical research and excavations at the Sanitarium and Bath House as presented in this publication.
